Sawley Abbey

At Sawley Abbey only part of the church and fragments of the cloister now survive above ground. The abbey, belonging to the Cistercian order, was founded in 1147 and operated until 1536, when the monks became embroiled in the Pilgrimage of Grace. This was an attempt by lay landowners, primarily in the north of England, to reinstate monks to their abbeys in defiance of Henry VIII's suppression order. Early in 1537 the monks finally left Sawley Abbey. It was stripped of all its valuable materials and left to crumble, quickly falling into a state of disrepair. In the 19th century, the site was cleared and a wall was built to encircle the ruins and the site became an early visitor attraction. More recently, in the 1970s and 80s, extensive excavations were carried out around the southern cloister.

Although the church and the cloisters formed the core of the medieval abbey, this was only a small part of the monastic complex. The Landscape Investigation team looked at the landscape surrounding the ruins, beyond the 19th century wall. From our investigations, it was possible to define the outer monastic precinct as well as locating further monastic buildings and the abbey fishponds within it. A surviving section of the precinctwall, now used as a field boundary, was also discovered. In addition, the earthwork remains of at least two post-monastic farmsteads were identified within the precinct area. As is often the case, a large post-monastic house was built close to the abbey's claustral range; this had been demolished by 1884 but fragments of it still survive. Maps and field evidence suggest that the first farmstead was removed in the early 19th century when a park was created, while the second farmstead was screened from view by a tree-lined boundary.
